Greetings friends,

What a great week Mark and I've had. We picked up Miss Cora and brought her home on Sunday afternoon and enjoyed her entertaining company until Wednesday afternoon.

At 23 months, Cora is interested in nearly everything and nearly everything must be thoroughly investigated. She is absolutely ecstatic when new wonders are discovered and often can be heard to exclaim, "Wow!" Her constant movement and busyness can wear a grandparent out, but oh, her delight in all that she sees keeps us going.

On Thursday, when it was just us again, Mark and I reflected on Cora's visit as we surveyed the chaos of our kitchen and the family room. We decided that as wearing as it is for us, we wouldn't trade her enthusiasm for everything - for anything. In fact, we'd be better off if we tried seeing the world through her eyes.

We are literally surrounded in wonders and wealth that would have astounded our grandparents and a high percentage of the rest of the world. Each of us has so much that we don't even see our astounding good fortune. My grandpa passed away in 1975. I wonder what he would make of personal computers, smart phones, GPS, etc. If he came back today, I think he might be overwhelmed not only by our big screen TVs, our keyless cars and the number of them each family owns, but also by the overall wealth of Americans in 2018. As a society, we are rich in things beyond what his imagination would have ever conceived. And all too often, we don't even see it.

The flip side of all that fortune of possessions is the loss of our sense of wonder in the simpler things. The amazing beauty of a pretty flower and how the petals flutter when you blow on it...the way sand or soil feel sifting through our fingers...how high a splash of water can go if you slap it really hard...how much more yummy a banana is if you get to peel it for yourself...and how a kiss and a gentle hug can soothe a pinched finger.

It may be trite to say what has been said so many times before, but perhaps in taking time to appreciate simplicity, we will be rejuvenated and given new energy. Perhaps in slowing down and looking for moments that make us exclaim, "Wow", we'll be grateful for the glorious wonder that is life. Perhaps if we look with the eyes of a child, we'll see our abundant blessings.
