Greetings friends,

I do believe the “dreary wearies” of winter have taken up residence. As I write this (Thursday), the sky is gloomy, our little corner of the world is ice covered and lots of snow is in the forecast over the next few days. Spring seems a long way away on days like this. As is often the case, when the weather is bad, all I can think about is making comfort food.

What is it about inclement weather that prompts that response? It’s the same impulse that creates long lines at the grocery store as folks rush to pick up milk, eggs, bread and other essentials before the storm hits. Out on the prairie in days of yore, one could understand such emergency stockpiling. Perhaps for more rural, big families with small children and before easy transportation, refrigerators, and huge snow plows it made sense. But in Mark’s and my case, as two middle-aged, empty nesters living in town just blocks from the store, I wonder. I can’t recall a storm so ferocious that we were snowbound for days.

Still, there I am cooking up a different kind of storm as bad weather approaches. Often this “Storm Cooking” takes the form of a meat-filled soup of some sort or a huge casserole or big meat and potatoes meal. It’s fortunate we’re leftover fans at our house.

But, true confession time, even when the weather is nice we like to cook big meals a few times a week and then dine on leftovers for a couple days. I’m not sure if this is laziness or efficiency. I just know we don’t go hungry on stormy winter days at our house.

Be safe this weekend!
